We had this brilliant idea. What if you put a group of students into a classroom for one day and taught them how to craft good poems-haiku, free verse, sonnets, etc.-and just let them write about anything they wanted. Allowed them to express their thoughts, feelings, ideas about their world. What if you then equipped those students with the tools to actually publish a collection of those poems...in one day! Could they come up with a title, design a cover, proofread, write an introduction...Could they summon the focus and courage to accomplish such a lofty goal? Could we teach them to do the write thing? Could we provide a literary experience that was fun, inspirational, and transformative. Could these students produce a...book in one day. Blind spots can be shallow and simple, or deep and vastly complicated. Things just occur in life and you never quite expect them: losing your will to carry on, falling in and out of love, someone passing away. In this book of poetry, you will read interpretations of unplanned events and sporadic emotions that just had to appear on paper. Not only here at Brentwood, but around the world every person has experienced blind spots. This book is for the times in life when you feel ambushed and attacked, caught off guard even. This book can serve as your refuge during hard times or a constant reminder that you will make it through. Written by teenagers for teenagers, Blind Spots is full of zeal. And vision. See us.
