Both hot, both tempting, both with a secret that they've never told their best friend Mari. Felix is brooding, mysterious, and full of tales he's yet to tell Mari. She wants to know those secrets, she wants to pull them out of him over long nights of long glances and deep kisses.

Then there's Gage. Care-free and light to Felix's dark. An open book, but is there a hint of shadow in his oh so tempting eyes? Are there secrets there he's never spoken of either?

Mari knew if she was to have either she would have to make a choice. But why does she have to make that choice? Why can't she have both? With an impish smile, an idea in place, and two weeks of travel by motorcycle to work with surely she could find a way to make the idea work?

As Mari, Felix, and Gage travel the roads through the forests of California Mari's desire grows, as does Felix and Gage's. Mari's managed to get them to look past the hard part, getting them to see her as more than just a little sister. Can she now convince them that two lovers are better than one?

As the journey continues the trio start to explore far more than just the open roads and rest stops that California has to offer. Will a bump in the road in the form of a missing phone stop the trip? And will the reappearance of that phone, with pictures of the trio which they didn't take, be a signal that there is far more danger in the mountains of California than a stray bear?
